The electronic stock market is organized by exchanges hosting an electronic “limit order book”, where limit orders and market orders are collected. This evolves on the millisecond time-scale by computerized trading at a speed too fast for human reactions. The dynamics and stability of this system are naturally of great interest but little understood. We describe a well-known machine learning method called the Support Vector Machine and apply it to real-time short-term forecasting of price movements.